Google and CFR Team Up To Halt Criticism of NWO

By Michael Collins Piper

Google, the Internet giant, is now engaging in quasi-governmental police-state-style activity, harnessing its considerable influence and wealth to challenge what it refers to as "extremism."

Although it's popular in this day and age to oppose"extremism," the truth is that the media and powerful international plutocratic interests append this label to any group or individual that challenges the global power elite and its drive for a New World Order.

Now Google — which maintains near total control over the Internet — is using its resources to set up a framework to combat those who dare say "no" to the New World Order.

Through the aegis of its front group, Google Ideas — a so-called "think tank" — Google recently set up an international conference in Dublin, Ireland, dubbed the Summit Against Violent Extremism (SAVE), where it gathered together an odd mix of more than 200 attendees, including "80 former Muslim extremists, neonazis, U.S. gang members and other former radicals," to hammer out ways to use technology to enforce what Google calls global "deradicalization."

To understand the nature of Google's scheme is relatively simple when one considers the fact that the individual in charge of the venture is Jared Cohen.

A youthful former State Department policy planning staff official in both the Bush and Obama administrations, Cohen also happens to be an adjunct fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR), the New York offshoot of the London-based Royal Institute of International Affairs that functions as the foreign-policy arm of the global Rothschild banking dynasty. In fact, on June 25 The Washington Post reported that the CFR was responsible for helping organize the Dublin conference.

Likewise, it is no coincidence that Cohen was a Rhodes scholar at Oxford University in England, having been indoctrinated by the scholarships — funded by the trust of longtime Rothschild front man Cecil Rhodes — which advocate the concept that the United States should be reunited with Great Britain which (since the early 19th century) had fallen under the control of the Rothschild interests and whose vaunted empire (enriched by the looting of the world's resources) was the source of much of the Rothschild family's wealth.

At the State Department, Cohen used his connections to assist Iranian dissidents (also supported by Israeli intelligence) fighting to dislodge Iranian leader Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

In recent years, major players on the global stage charged with anti-Semitism and "radicalism," such as Ahmadinejad, have challenged — and are targets of — the New World Order.

In Superclass: The Global Power Elite and the World They Are Making — a volume acknowledging the influence of such New World Order institutions as the CFR — author David Rothkopf writes approvingly of this new global "superclass." He says the 21st century's "political fault line" will be a battle of globalists vs. nationalists and that there is an emerging "global network of antiglobalists" opposing the aims of this superclass.

Rothkopf specifically named three figures among this small group of leaders challenging the New World Order: Ahmadinejad, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and Russian Prime Minster Vladimir Putin. To that list we add such others as Malaysia's valiant Dr. Mahathir Mohamad, no-nonsense Alexander Lukashenko of Belarus and Syria's courtly Bashir Assad.

Rothkopf's opinions are no idle chatter. He speaks from very real insider status, being a member of the superclass himself. He served as managing director of Kissinger Associates, the international consulting firm of former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, one of the foremost modern-era architects of the New World Order.

Today we find Google joining the effort to combat nationalists, populists and others who are deemed "radicals." Those concerned with Google's already-notorious censorship of the Internet should be more concerned than ever. Google's SAVE scheme appears to be the opening salvo in a major, well-funded, carefully crafted campaign to save the New World Order from its foes.
